Session Highlights: Prof. Ragade Jwala R. began the session by introducing the concept of the Human Development Index (HDI). She explained that HDI is a composite index that measures a country's average achievements in three basic aspects of human development: health, education, and standard of living. These dimensions are represented by:

1. Life Expectancy: A measure of the overall health and longevity of a population.
2. Education Index: Assessed through mean years of schooling and expected years of schooling.
3. Gross National Income (GNI) per Capita: Reflecting the standard of living and income levels.

Prof. Jwala elaborated on the origins and development of the HDI, detailing how it was introduced by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in 1990 as a way to shift the focus from purely economic measures of development, such as GDP, to a broader understanding of human well-being.

Key topics covered during the session included:

1. Calculation and Interpretation of HDI:

- The methodology used to calculate HDI and its components.
- How to interpret HDI scores and rankings to understand a country's development status.

2. Strengths and Limitations of HDI:

- The advantages of using HDI as a measure of development, including its simplicity and focus on human well-being.
- Criticisms and limitations of HDI, such as its inability to capture inequality, environmental sustainability, and cultural factors.

3. Global and Regional Trends:

- Analysis of HDI trends over the years, highlighting improvements and persistent challenges in various regions.
- Case studies of countries with significant changes in HDI, illustrating the impact of policy choices on human development.

4. HDI and Policy Implications:

- The role of HDI in shaping national and international development policies.
- How governments and organizations use HDI to prioritize areas for intervention and resource allocation.

Throughout the session, Prof. Jwala engaged participants with interactive discussions, encouraging them to analyze HDI data and consider the implications for their own regions. She also provided insights into recent developments and future directions in human development measurement.

Summary: The workshop concluded with an interactive Q&A session, where participants were able to ask questions and seek further clarification on the topics discussed. Prof. Jwala provided thoughtful responses, enriching the participants' understanding of HDI and its relevance to contemporary development challenges.

In his closing remarks, Prof. Amol Deepakrao Dhule expressed gratitude to Prof. Ragade Jwala R. for her insightful presentation and thanked all participants for their active engagement. He also acknowledged the support of Principal Dr. Vikas Limbaji Kadam in facilitating the workshop and emphasized the importance of continued learning and discussion on topics like HDI.
